A Fatal Shot.

Yesterday morning James Yowell was out hunting and on his way home about 10 o'clock, he stopped and was talking with one of the Farmer Bros., who was at work framing a barn. Mr. Yowell came up and was standing near a pile of scantling and was resting his gun with the stock on the ground and holding the muzzle in his right hand. One of the Farmer Bros. came up to the pile of timbers to get a scantling, and when eight or ten feet away he heard the report of the gun, and looking back saw the effects of the discharge.

The cause of the discharge is a matter of mere conjecture, as no one saw it; the presumption is, however, that when Mr. Yowell started to leave he raised the gun and in so doing, the hammer was caught on a projecting piece of timber, pulling it back, and when it fell back on the tube it caused the fatal shot. The gun was loaded with shot which seemed to scatter as they left the muzzle of the gun, striking him in the right temple, tearing off his ear and blowing the right side of his skull into a thousand fragments; from this wound the brains and blood flowed freely, making a piteous and awful spectacle, and causing the lookers on to turn heart sick. Mr. Yowell lived only about 30 minutes. Dr. J. O. Coffey was summoned, but the poor man was dead before the doctor reached him.

This family has been very unfortunate. Mr. Yowell had two sons killed by accident—one by a horse kicking him on the head and the other met his death by falling out of a tree.

In the death of Mr. Yowell our community loses a most valued citizen, the church a zealous member, and the family an amiable husband and father.—Queen City Transcript.
